While the slave-trade was at its zenith, Loanda was a place of great opulence; the Mother Church was in the glory of all her abominations. Her Jesuits had a congenial field, her priests occupied palaces-- grand and magnificent cimrches, coriVents, and nunneries were met on every side, and wealth, and grandeur, and Church prosperity kept pace with the awful strides of the nefarious traffic in human flesh. But with the decay of the slave-trade, the place has quite fallen into delapidation. Those splendid temples, he says, are now the habitations for the moles, or workshops for convicts guilty of the foulest crimes. The fraternity is now unrepresented by a living man. We can scarcely gauge the dimensions of a curse which should identify Christianity with that most abominable and devastating trade. Christianity is emphatically...
