CHAPTER XVII. ARKANSAS SCHOOLS. 1819-1905. In the pioneer days of Arkansas, the same difficulties that confronted the farmer and the lawyer were felt also by the teacher, and often more keenly. The children on the frontier had poor educational advantages, not because our forefathers did not believe in education, but because they had no money to establish schools. Then, too, the country was sparsely settled, the population as late as 183G being less than one person to the square mile. The elementary schools of early Arkansas were mostly private schools. The teacher canvassed the community with his articles, as the paper setting forth the terms of his school was called, and the people subscribed scholars at one or more dollars each per month. He took part of his pay in boarding round among his pupils. As there was but little money in the district, it was frequently stipulated in his contract that he could be paid in meal, pork, sugar, coffee, or other acceptable produce. Often these frontier schools were taught by the...
